SIMONE’S STORY

Simone has moved at lightning speed since leaving her domestic violence situation. After surviving 15 years of abuse, Simone has relocated, holds two jobs, and is applying to apartments near her work with the ultimate goal of reuniting with her son.

Like many survivors, Simone’s abuser controlled the finances so when they separated he retained the home, and she had to start all over. Simone had to part ways with many of the relationships she built while with her abuser, and without these connections, or a steady income, it was impossible for Simone to find a safe place to live.

After making fast friends in a safe house community, Simone was referred to the North Seattle Opportunity Center for Education and Employment. There, she was able to apply for resources like Temporary Assistance for Needy Families and the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program, as well as receive intensive wraparound services from Solid Ground.

Solid Ground helped her to get a new ID and birth certificate, and provided gas cards so that she could make her appointments to follow through with her divorce. Because move-in costs can be prohibitively expensive, Simone will qualify for move-in assistance once she finds an apartment within her budget.

Leaving DV situations can take time, and quality service providers are crucial. Simone says, “Things started to fall into place like a domino effect—I’ve never gotten resources as quickly and as efficiently before.” Stability empowered Simone to speak courageously about the challenges women in abusive situations face, and she is committed to start a support group to help other women.
